Since his accession to the throne of his glorious ancestors, His Majesty the King Mohammed VI expressed concern over the condition of women in Morocco and for establishing equality between women and men. Actually, in a speech on August 20, 1999, he stated the problem in the following terms: "How can we hope to attain progress and prosperity when women, who constitute half of our society, see their basic rights trampled underfoot, irrespective of the rights granted to them by our holy religion that make them equal to men in a consistent way with their noble mission, and which protect them from any iniquity or violence they might be exposed to despite their achievements which place them on an equal footing with men, whether in the scientific field or on the job market?"

This important speech was the first step in a reappraisal of the condition of Moroccan women, for His Majesty - may God lengthen his days - made a special point in his subsequent speeches of the need to establish equality between men and women regarding rights and duties.

This royal concern for the condition of women coincided with political wrangling that Morocco previously experienced over the rights of women and the Personal Status Code, after the alternance coalition government had hoisted a bill entitled: "Plan for the integration of women in national development", and which had at the time occasioned controversy between its supporters and opponents.

With respect to his aforesaid concern, on March 5, 2001, His Majesty the King granted an audience to representatives of the political parties and Moroccan women's organizations and associations, during which he listened to their claims and opinions.

In view of women's important and efficient role in national development, not to mention their pivotal role in the family and in building a democratic Moroccan society abreast of its times, and mindful of its Islamic identity in terms of respect for women, on April 27, 2001, His Majesty the King announced his enlightened decision to set up an advisory council aimed at revising the Personal Status Code. After appointing its members he asked them to examine ways and means to guarantee a sound implementation of the Personal Status Code, together with a bill aimed at revising its terms, and which would be submitted to His Majesty's perusal.
